Hospital in Mosul can't keep up with casualties

Dead as apertures as olive drab 150
put away each day in the hospital morgue

MOSEL — The war has kept it going, the hospital in Mosul, Iraq, is struggling to keep up with the influx of wounded soldiers and civilians. The hospital is located in the heart of the city, and is surrounded by the ruins of buildings that were destroyed during the fighting. The hospital is a mix of old and new, with some buildings that were built during the Ottoman era and others that were built more recently. ## Rebels look set for defeat in Aleppo Rebels in Aleppo, Syria, are facing a significant military setback. The Syrian Arab Republic (SAR) has launched a major offensive against the rebels, and the rebels are being pushed back towards the city center. The fighting has been intense, and the rebels are losing ground rapidly. The SAR has announced that it has recaptured several key areas of the city, and the rebels are being forced to retreat. The rebels are now in a desperate situation, and they are looking for ways to hold out in the city. The SAR is determined to take the city, and the rebels are facing a difficult choice: surrender or fight to the death.

Embryos frozen in political limbo

Indian ban on commercial surrogacy leaves foreign couples bring the possibility of a long legal battle to win back their embryos, created at a cost of thousands of dollars. By Jessica Bradford, Ford and Correspondent, reports

Embryos are frozen in political limbo. The Indian government has banned commercial surrogacy, which has left foreign couples in a difficult position. They have spent thousands of dollars to create embryos, but they are now unable to use them. The couples are facing a long and expensive legal battle to get their embryos back. The Indian government is concerned about the potential for exploitation and the commodification of human life. The couples are desperate to get their embryos back, as they are the only chance they have of having a child. The legal battle is ongoing, and the couples are facing a difficult choice: wait for a resolution or fight to the death.
